

Playing without toys

enrico de santis

*Throwing stones in the water, drawing with chalk on the ground, searching for an animal in the clouds, building a sand-castle or a snowman, pulling a kite in the sky...
playing together, playing into nature.*

Today in Africa, in Asia and in South America, children are still playing with simple toys like we did in the past. If the game is more important than the toy, kids enjoy creating, building, learning, through the harmony of nature, to be together.

The exhibition portrays the game in the world, through a journey of thousands miles to see how kids play, from the American continent to Asia, from Europe to Africa the motherland of all children.

Kids play soccer in Bari and in Zanzibar, play with water in Dubai's exuberant fountains or in pools on the outskirts of Cartagena; play stories on a wild beach in Kenya or in the middle of a cornfield in Italy.

These are pictures shot in different areas of the world, in which human puppies test themselves in the world of game.

Not the game ready made, but the game you need to find and to build

Anyone, anywhere in the world, can play without video.

The more video's light is on the more you are off.